Anomaly Classification: Object

Discovery Date: 1995

Current Status: Active

Anomaly: O-015

Codename: "Silence Clock"

SUBJECT DESCRIPTION:

O-015, codenamed "The Silence Clock," refers to a series of non-digital wall clocks, initially ordinary in nature, which have been anomalously transformed. Affected clocks operate in complete silence, producing no ticking sound, and induce a distortion in temporal perception for individuals within close proximity. These clocks are consistent in their anomalous properties, regardless of brand, make, or prior condition before exposure.

ANOMALOUS PROPERTIES:

Temporal Distortion: Individuals within a 10-meter radius of O-015 experience a warped perception of time. These distortions vary but often include missing time, elongated moments of stillness, or the sense that time is moving faster or slower than normal. The effect grows more pronounced with prolonged exposure. Some report events occurring out of sequence or find they've "lost" minutes or hours without realizing it.

Auditory Suppression: All instances of O-015 operate without producing any mechanical sound, including the expected ticking associated with non-digital clocks. This absence of sound appears to affect the surrounding area, creating an unnatural stillness that extends beyond the clock itself. Individuals report a sense of "heaviness" in the air, as though even ambient noise is dampened.

Self-Reconstruction: When damaged or disassembled, O-015 will autonomously repair itself over a period of several days, returning to full functionality. Attempts to fully destroy an instance have failed, with parts reassembling without external assistance. Any clock that has been disassembled will begin to tick again in complete silence once restored.
